are critical to our ability to manage migration flows in a manner that best serves the national empower society.

A human-rights-based approach is also essential in our endeavors to counter human trafficking.

2. Countering Trafficking of Women

This brings me to my second point. Due to their dual vulnerability as migrants and as women, women are still disproportionately affected by a range of risks arising from their mobility. Actions have been taken at all levels to combat trafficking in persons and considerable progress has been made on the legislative front. Yet, prosecution rates remain low, while the
